

Queen Dahlia

The pyramid was 777' tall (236.8m), more skyward than any other and it required a crew of 300 to dig its boundaries and basic land use from a fundamental massive sand covering, similar to a beach in Palawan.

Some Pharaoh clearly established the oddly preserved building in a place that was filled with dunes to the point that the pyramid showed only its apex of chiseled limestone the size of a coffee cup, having been discovered by a Cairo boatsman who'd hit the desert while suffering a large bottle of Arak. Unlike all aged pyramids this one had its original polished Tura intact, a façade which made it shine in sun like a solar power plant and at night carry blue ambience of strange muted star glows and the moon passing over. When it arrived.

And now that the pyramid was 100% physically exposed and the sands around it razed, time to explore. It was quickly discovered that the originating "Pharaoh" was actually a woman, an elite and staggering svelte Queen still alive in the exact center of the complex, wearing a delightful royal linen kalasiris embroidered with rainbow beads and gold threads.

On her head the Queen wore a staggering nemes headcloth accented with uraeus, the cobra, a ferocious elegant snake that showed the Queen's ultra-command in Egypt, long ago. Which would have been 4000 years back at least...and yet she was still alive today, late 2020s CE aged 36 or so, waiting here on a throne carved from some sort of fine light wood filled with various colored glass, gold, silver, and many hieroglyphs done by an expert unknown staffer.

Right after finding her, the Queen arranged with local Egyptian execs a deal for her to lease the pyramid property to the government, with no determined time limit.

Queen Dahlia / 2.

Using parts of her personal stashed treasure, estimated at two billion US in minerals and various gems, she acquired a tall thin new condominium in Dubai, which she commissioned built from scratch by Adrian Smith who covered her 21 stylized floors with a similar pyramid Tura-style façade that flame-reflected desert sunlight and used overnight stars for subtle electric hue.

As revealed from the start (but not mentioned until now) the Queen was long known by the name Dahlia Elgohary, for reasons wiped from Egyptian records and glyphs. Later according to Dahlia, while she sat in Dubai's Electric Pawn Shop with a friend, she said she was cleared from all ancient Egyptian records due to her early discovery of coffee, growing then in what we know today as Ethiopia...and many centuries before the bean was understood by Homo sapiens.

A global coffee distributor begged Dahlia to endorse their specific grinds, largely due to her immortality and top-grade Chanel model appearance...but she was happy to have her books, her Adrian Smith condo, and many lovely places to optionally dine, when desired.

With her onyx bouncy black silky hair in wonderful bob with sharp edges, like Kim Cattrall from Star Trek 1991.

End.